Nantwich Choral Society

St Mary's Church

GREATLY daring, Nantwich Choral Society presented Liszt's Via Crucis — the 14 Stations of the Cross for mixed choir, vocal solos and organ at St Mary's — Church on Saturday night.

Via Crucis is always restrained and devout, yet has a continuous use of experimental harmony (it is very late Liszt) that gives the work a unique atmosphere defying description.

The concert set-up was unusual, the three female soloists singing together from different areas of the church while the solitary bass remained in the pulpit. The mixed choir, under the direction of Patrick Larley, accompanied them with sensitivity, and Andrew Mildinhall was superlative at the organ.

The female trio — soprano Sarah Cromwell, mezzo Katie Harvey and alto Jocelyn Cooper — were deeply moving in the Stations where Jesus falls, and the bass, John Rowlands-Pritchard, was sonorous and forthright throughout.

Via Crucis is one of those works that require more than one hearing, though whether any other local choral society will have the courage to follow the Nantwich example is open to question. After the interval, Sarah Cromwell and Katie Harvey rendered two Faure Motets with charm, aided by Mildinhall at the organ. Then the choristers sang the Messe Solenelle of Jean Langlais, the blind French composer.

If Via Crucis was strange and introspective, Messe Solennelle was plain difficult — the Sanctus, in particular, must have been dizzying to perform. But Larley kept the choristers to their tasks, and Mildinhall was again a tower of strength at the organ.
